A man without a plan is a shell without purpose. Which is why when I sat down nine years ago and put pen to paper, mapping out a ten-year plan, I meant business. Everything that could set me up for a lifetime of joy had to go down on the list, and every day, I worked my ass off to fulfill it. Open my own sports agency. Check. Earn first million by my thirtieth birthday. I did that a week before I turned twenty-six. Negotiate the most lucrative contract in Major League history. Did that, too. Then went and broke my own record. (Thanks, big bro!) I could go on, but this isn't about bragging. It's me admitting that in the midst of drafting something that helps shape and mold much of my success, I still made a costly mistake. One day I realized all those entries with corresponding checkmarks are pointless if I don't factor into the equation the most important goal of all. Avery. Perhaps way back then I wasn't ready to see how much my best friend of fifteen years deserved that number one spot in my life. Maybe I was blind, since the whole "settle down and get married" scenario wasn't my thing. But now that I'm aware of the role I need her to fill in my life, there's no such thing as letting go until I can convince her to be mine. Her being about to marry someone else does make winning her heart a little bit dicey. But if there's anything you should know about me, it's that I always play to win. And losing Avery is nonnegotiable. The Breakup Plan A Best Friends to Enemies Romance
